Rotorcraft: the next major step in aviation? Rotorcraft are small, highly manoeuvrable aircraft that are capable of travelling at low speed in relatively small spaces.

They are typically powered by one or more small turbines, with rotating propellers. They have the potential to be much more capable than fixed-wing aircraft, and are under development in numerous countries, including the UK and the USA. They are attractive to many people because they can be operated by a pilot without the need for a large, expensive airport, and they may offer a solution for smaller airports with difficult site access. However, there are serious issues with rotorcraft, particularly safety. Rotorcraft are being used for air transport in several countries. For example, a rotorcraft is currently operating at Dubai airport in the United Arab Emirates (see image below). The British rotorcraft programme, which will see small four-seat aircraft designed to carry a pilot and two passengers, will be based at Sheerness Airport in Kent, the Royal Navy's airship base at

RNAS Culdrose in Cornwall, and RAF Fairwood Common in West Sussex. Rotorcraft, such as the Aeromotive AR4400 XRS, have a compact design that can accommodate a pilot, two passengers, and a payload of up to 200 kg (440 lb). These small aircraft have the potential to offer a cost-effective solution for people who need to travel short distances, such as a hospital or school. If a rotorcraft could fly at only 400 metres (1,300 ft) above the ground, it would still be capable of transporting passengers, and in congested areas it could do so without disturbing traffic. A similar-sized aircraft with a conventional propulsion system (e.g. a jet engine) would have to fly at more than 5,000 metres (17,000 ft) to be able to carry passengers, and in those conditions it could endanger aircraft and ground infrastructure. A rotorcraft with a conventional jet engine could use the same airspace as an airliner, but a rotorcraft designed to carry passengers would have to be
