iPhone Facebook unveiled a new iPhone messaging app on Thursday, which will allow users to chat with friends and family via messaging or phone calls with a tap of their phone. The app will be available to all iPhone users in the U.S. in coming days.
Here's a video of Facebook's David Mattingly explaining the new app: The new app, called Facebook Messenger, will offer all the features of a messaging app, including the ability to send photos and videos. However, it will also be able to make and receive phone calls from friends and family. The app will use the iPhone's phone number as a contact ID and can be used with Facebook's existing Messenger app for Android. "Messenger is a new communications app that brings the power and capabilities of a social network directly to the people and things that are most important to you, and we're making it available to everyone in the U.S. this week," said Justin Osofsky, vice president of Product at Facebook. Facebook's original messaging app, Facebook Messenger, launched in 2015 and helped connect more than 200 million people, but has been criticized for features that felt clunky, including the inability to send photos and videos. So it's expected that Messenger is a big target for Facebook.
Many of Facebook's main features, including messaging, have been slowly rolled out to mobile users over the past year. The company announced this month that it would require users to sign into Facebook with a mobile device. It also revealed a new text messaging feature, Facebook Lite, for mobile devices. In announcing the new app, Facebook also announced the end of its WhatsApp app for mobile devices, saying it will now focus on building the Facebook Messenger app. WhatsApp will continue to operate in some countries.Q: How to handle multiple unique values in the same 2d92ce491b
